Dear Remote Embedded team,

I have spent my career making partner-sold revenue happen, from both sides of the motion. As VP Asia at Brightcove I built the partner channel that generated 35% of regional pipeline while the region grew from ~$4M to ~$11.5M ARR, above quota every year. Then, advising the IoT company BinaryTech, I landed an exclusive global reseller agreement through Roche Diagnostics, which put our entire revenue line inside another company's sales organisation. Nothing sold unless their people sold it. So we made their sellers productive: training until they could pitch without us, playbooks their reps actually carried, a pipeline cadence that surfaced blocked deals early, and executive engagement with their Swiss headquarters. That channel delivered multiple NHS wins and a 10-year contract with OLVG in the Netherlands.

That is your job description in mirror image: making embedded partners' sellers increasingly independent at generating, qualifying and closing Remote opportunities, while you carry the number yourself.

The rest of the spec I can evidence just as concretely. I built and led a 20+ person org across Singapore, Mumbai and New Delhi, managed managers, held turnover under 10%, and promoted 80% of AEs from inside. At Livepeer I stood up the commercial operating system from nothing, which meant forecasting, contracting cadence, CRM discipline and team training. I negotiated the Roche agreement with their headquarters and led the team that closed Brightcove's largest global deal at ~$4M ARR. You ask for the big and the small: I have NASDAQ-listed scale behind me and seven years working inside startups and scale-ups.

You build automation and AI into the requirements for every role. I already work that way, and I build my own AI agents, MCP servers and GTM automation.

I have also worked async and remote since 2019, including four years running a business across borders and time zones, literally from a 40-foot boat. Remote's way of working is simply how I work.

I would welcome 20 minutes on the embedded partner portfolio and where I would start.

Best regards,
Ben Morrell
