Dear Hiring Team,

When Watching That hired me to build their partnerships function from zero, the first partner I signed was Brightcove: a partner they had pursued for three to four years. Four partners across Europe, the US and APAC followed. That is the job you are describing — turn relationships and positioning into a qualified pipeline of paid engagements — and it is the work I have done repeatedly, fractionally, for seven years.

Three things make me an unusually direct fit. First, partnerships is my core discipline: at Brightcove I recruited 15+ ISV and agency partners whose channel drove 35% of regional pipeline, and through my consultancy I structured a 7-figure, 3-year exclusive reseller partnership through the Roche Diagnostics channel. I know how to design partner and retainer models that complement a firm's own services rather than compete with them.

Second, your world is my native territory. I have spent 18 years in video — broadcast production and post-production at Nine Network, video SaaS at Brightcove and Encoding.com — and the last seven advising 20+ startup founders on GTM across SaaS and AI. I host the GTM Expertise podcast (26+ episodes with sales and partnerships leaders), so building relationships with founders, investor platform teams and PR firms through useful content is already how I operate.

Third, the mechanics will be tight from day one. I run my own CRM, outbound sequencing and lead-scoring stack — I build these tools myself with AI — and at Livepeer I stood up the full commercial operating system: forecasting, contracting cadence and a repeatable sales motion.

A three-month pilot suits me: measure me on qualified conversations, pipeline created and the first paid engagements. I have run a business across borders and time zones, literally from a 40-foot boat; remote, self-directed and fractional is simply how I work.

I would welcome a conversation about your market-entry priorities for the pilot.

Best regards,
Ben Morrell
