Dear Kallipr hiring team,

The last IoT channel I built in Europe started from zero. As commercial lead for BinaryTech, an IoT hardware company with no European presence, I went straight to the biggest names in diagnostics and closed an exclusive global agreement to resell through the Roche Diagnostics channel: a 7-figure, 3-year-minimum partnership that produced multiple NHS wins and a 10-year deal with OLVG in the Netherlands. That work was rugged devices, public-sector tenders, long cycles, and partners trained to sell and support on their own. It is the same shape as the region you need built.

I have run channel at scale too. As VP Asia at Brightcove I grew the region from ~$4M to ~$11.5M ARR across 15+ countries. I recruited 15+ partners, and the channel came to drive 35% of regional pipeline, with recruitment, onboarding, enablement and joint go-to-market executed regionally against a global program. Earlier, as Bid Manager at Grass Valley, tenders and complex RFPs were literally my job.

And your leadership team would never need to explain Australia to me. I am an Australian citizen and my engineering career started in Sydney: at Nine Network I designed and supported ~20 rugged flyaway kits that went to disaster zones on every continent, and at Gencom, a systems integrator, I delivered field systems across Australia and Asia. I have also been the European end of an Australian company before. I led UK market entry for Campus Plus, opened the office, and signed their first UK university. Being the trusted commercial arm on the ground while HQ sleeps is a mode I know well.

The mission lands with me too: the networks your devices watch over are the ones communities actually depend on, and that is where I want to build. Operating solo does not worry me either. I have run a business across borders and time zones, literally from a 40-foot boat. Remote and self-directed is simply how I work.

I would welcome a conversation, starting with the European partner network I would bring on day one.

Best regards,
Ben Morrell
