Dear Hiring Team,

I build LLM applications and author production MCP servers, which puts me on the reuser side of the problem this role exists to solve. When a model serves up an answer that came from Wikipedia, whether the attribution survives the trip was settled upstream, by a product team, long before anyone saw the output. Those decisions get made in engineering and design reviews. I can sit in one and argue the case.

I have spent 18+ years forming multi-stakeholder partnerships across technology and media. At Brightcove I recruited 15+ strategic ISV and agency partners and ran regional execution of the global partner programs, and that channel grew to 35% of regional pipeline while I took the region from ~$4M to ~$11.5M ARR as VP. I got there from a technical seat: Senior Solutions Engineer, then Technical Director responsible for every customer in the region, then VP. Data formats, reliability commitments and what a partner's engineers can actually ship are familiar ground.

The closest match to your brief is Watching That, where I built the partnerships function from nothing and signed Brightcove, a partner the company had chased for three or four years. There was no money on the table. The value exchange was integration and distribution, so the deal had to be won on strategic fit and on being useful to their roadmap. A zero-dollar LOI works the same way. I have also negotiated an exclusive global reseller agreement through the Roche Diagnostics channel, where the counterparty was an $80B company and most of the work was patience and getting their internal stakeholders lined up.

One practical note: I am based in Valencia and would engage through my own non-Spanish business entity as an independent contractor, which I understand suits how you structure these roles. I have run a business across borders and time zones, literally from a 40-foot boat, so highly independent and self-directed is simply how I work.

I would welcome 20 minutes to talk about which reusers you would go after first.

Best regards,
Ben Morrell
