Dear South Pole hiring team,

The largest deal in Brightcove's global history — $12M over three years — was closed by my team in Asia: a long-cycle, multi-stakeholder, consultative negotiation with a buyer who had never contracted at that scale before. That is the deal shape CORSIA demand now requires of the market, and it is the muscle I would bring to owning South Pole's global CORSIA revenue.

Over 18+ years I have built commercial results in exactly the conditions this role describes. As VP Asia at Brightcove I grew the region from ~$4M to ~$11.5M ARR inside a global, matrixed, NASDAQ-listed organization — exceeding quota every year at 120%+ while holding margin discipline, and building a 20+ person commercial team across three countries with under 10% turnover. I know how to run a global pipeline with real conversion rigor, and how to lead through regional teams I do not directly control.

I will be direct about carbon markets: I have not spent my career in them. What I have done, repeatedly, is enter regulated, technical markets cold and close long-term agreements there. Most recently I took an IoT firm into European medical diagnostics from a standing start — signing an exclusive global reseller agreement through the Roche Diagnostics channel (7-figure, 3-year minimum) that led to NHS wins and a 10-year contract in the Netherlands. An engineering degree and a career selling technical infrastructure mean I get credibly fluent in registry, MRV and Article 6 mechanics fast — and the commercial fundamentals of flagship-transaction origination do not change.

Climate is where I have chosen to point this experience next, deliberately. I would welcome a conversation about how I can help South Pole win the CORSIA market while the window to define it is open.

Best regards,
Ben Morrell
