Dear Jack,

Re: European Commercial Lead – Climate Technology

I have built new markets for technical platforms twice, from a standing start. At Brightcove I grew Asia from ~$4M to ~$11.5M ARR as VP, opening four new country markets and building a partner channel that drove 35% of regional pipeline. At Encoding.com I opened APAC from a written market-entry thesis: an executive roadshow across four countries, qualified pipeline up 1200%, the region's largest systems integrator signed as a partner, and multiple 6-figure ARR contracts personally closed. That is the job your client is describing — create the European market, not inherit it.

Three things map directly to this role. First, the build motion: strategy through to revenue, combining hands-on business development with partnerships, is the pattern of my whole career. Second, technical and regulation-led value propositions: I am an engineer by training (MEng), I progressed from solutions engineer to VP, and my most recent channel win was a regulation-led sale — an exclusive global reseller agreement through Roche Diagnostics that produced multiple NHS wins and a 10-year hospital contract in the Netherlands. Complex operational data, reporting obligations and standards-driven buyers are familiar ground. Third, the sector move is deliberate: I am taking a market-building record earned in high-growth tech into climate and clean energy, because that is where I want the next decade of my work to compound.

I am based in Valencia, set up for remote work across Europe with an international team, and comfortable travelling regularly for customers and industry events. I have run a business across borders and time zones, literally from a 40-foot boat: remote and self-directed is simply how I work.

I would welcome a conversation about the role and the company behind it.

Best regards,
Ben Morrell
