Hello Axle team,

Thank you for a posting that describes the actual work. “Create and disprove hypotheses as quickly as possible” is most of what I have done for the last seven years.

Through Ziplake I went into B2B tech companies after their home-market success and opened the next region for them. A written thesis first, then calls and meetings to test it, and once something held up I did the partnerships and closed the first contracts myself.

For Encoding.com that meant APAC from a standing start. I wrote the market-entry thesis, ran an executive roadshow across Singapore/India/Malaysia/Thailand and signed the region’s largest systems integrator. Qualified pipeline grew 1200%.

For BinaryTech, an Australian IoT hardware and SaaS company with no EU channel, it meant approaching Roche Diagnostics, Siemens and Beckman Coulter. That became an exclusive global reseller agreement through Roche, seven figures on a three-year minimum.

It stalled in Roche’s legal and compliance process and got signed because I kept their sponsors visible and held the founder firm on exclusivity. The channel produced NHS sales and a ten-year OLVG contract in the Netherlands.

Before that I was VP Asia at Brightcove. We opened Vietnam, Taiwan, Thailand and the Philippines with local partners ($2M+ new ARR) and I formally opened the India office, whilst the region grew from ~$4M to ~$11.5M ARR.

To be clear - energy markets are new ground for me. I trained as an engineer (MEng Electronic Engineering) and have spent years selling IoT devices and API-led platforms. I also build my own tooling, AI agents included.

I think regulation and market access are learnable at speed. Getting a large, regulated organisation like Roche to take the next call, and then sign, is the harder part. I have done that many times.

I’m based in Valencia, two hours from London, and recognise the posting asks for 2-3 days a week in Farringdon. An expansion role will likely spend a lot of time in the new markets, so I’d welcome a conversation on how that works.

So - happy to hop on a call to talk through which markets you’d test first.

Thanks again and looking forward to hearing from you,
Ben Morrell
