Dear Supercritical team,

This is an open application, so let me be specific: I want to run partnerships for you, and I am most useful on the supply side, sourcing, qualifying and contracting the project developers your marketplace is only as good as.

A marketplace built on offtake agreements needs someone who can hold a long-dated commercial negotiation together. That is the work I have done for eighteen years. I landed an exclusive global reseller agreement with Roche Diagnostics, an $80 billion counterparty, on a three-year minimum, from a standing start with no existing channel; it went on to drive multiple NHS sales and a ten-year contract with OLVG in the Netherlands. At Brightcove I led the team that closed the company's largest deal globally, $12 million over three years. Long-dated forward commitments with serious counterparties are not a new problem for me.

Nor is building the supply side from nothing. At Brightcove I recruited more than fifteen ISV and agency partners into a channel that ended up sourcing 35% of regional pipeline, while growing the region from roughly $4M to $11.5M ARR. At Watching That I built the partnerships function from scratch and signed a partner the company had chased for four years. Recruiting, qualifying and onboarding partners at volume, then keeping the good ones productive, is the motion I know best.

I will be straight with you: I am new to carbon removal. What I am not new to is a rigorous qualification bar. Listing 12% of what you vet is a discipline I recognise and would defend rather than erode.

On why climate, and why now. I live in Valencia, and I was here for the DANA floods in October 2024. Watching your own city go under concentrates the mind on what you spend the next decade doing.

I have run a business across borders and time zones, literally from a 40-foot sailboat, so remote and self-directed is simply how I work. Quarterly trips to Old Street are no obstacle.

I would welcome a conversation when something relevant opens up.

Best regards,
Ben Morrell
